GARRITY RIGHTS AND PUBLIC EMPLOYEES

The Garrity rule comes from the United States Supreme Court case of Garrity v. New Jersey. It is the right of a law enforcement officer¹ to be free from compulsory self-incrimination. The basic thrust of the Garrity Rule is that a department member may be compelled to give statements under threat of discipline or discharge but those statements may not be used in the criminal prosecution of the individual officer. The courts have held that choosing to work in a police department does not give a person a “watered-down” version of their Fifth Amendment to right against self-incrimination.

Before a law enforcement agency can discipline an officer for refusing to answer questions, the agency must do the following:

- Order the officer to answer the questions under threat of disciplinary action,
- Ask questions that are specifically, directly and narrowly related to the officer’s duties or the officer’s fitness for duty, AND
- Advise the officer that the answers to the questions will not be used against the officer in criminal proceedings.
